FOREIGN HOUSES MAKE STERLING LOANS.

The most important development in the stock market was the sharp break in sterling exchange. Local banking houses were heavy sellers of exchange against sterling loans. Cotton bills were more liberally offered, the break in cotton futures hastening purchases by foreign houses. Such liquidation which appeared in the warket was for public speculation. The stronger interests not only held on to their stocks, but bought extensively on the break. While money has still gone to the interior from the local banks, the demand has fallen off materially. Sentiment was much better at the close, although the short interest was not inclined to cover. Should the Treasury Department give the desired relief to the money market the effect upon securities will be electrical.
